

Born in a family of three siblings (including him), he is the youngest in the family. His father, V.P. Sahni, was a highly respected Indian Police Services officer in the Madhya Pradesh cadre, and his mother, Uma Sahni, was an excellent homemaker. "Being the youngest, I was the one blessed with everyone's love. I also had to work for everyone, bringing them water glasses and running small errands," he laughs.

However, belonging to an IPS family, life was not easy for him. Frequent transfers resulted in changes in schools, friends, etc. As his father served in the MP cadre, there were instances of transfers to remote areas, exposing him to challenging conditions!

"In seventh and eighth standards, I attended a school with no student desks. We all had to sit on floors, sometimes covered with cotton rags. There were times when teachers didn't show up due to fear of Naxalites," he recalls.

While these were challenges for Sahni, he observed the local population facing even more significant problems. The economically disadvantaged area had people struggling to make ends meet, some even without proper clothing. Ration shops lacked supplies but were crowded with people. Incidents of militants attacking cities and villages, looting whatever they could, were on the rise.

"Such challenges make you realise what you are going through is nothing. There are bigger problems to solve in the world," he explains.

Like many of us, Sahni considers his father his first idol. However, his father's actions to help him understand the difference between respect for a position and respect for a person are truly remarkable! Recognising Sahni's tremendous inclination towards the IPS officer's uniform and the number of salutes he received, his father had a police uniform stitched for Sahni on his birthday during the sixth standard.

"My father said, 'Let me take you for a drive in an IPS officer's official car today.' We went, and the moment the car left our home, we received salutes from police personnel and regular citizens. We went for round two, this time in our car, but the official car leading us.

Surprisingly, the salutes continued for the empty official car, and no salutes and recognition to them in the personal car. When we reached home, my father asked, 'What did you learn?'" Sahni was confused, and his father helped him understand the complete practice.

"He explained that people salute the official car because of its position, not because of who's inside.
