

Your bottle can tell if you are hydrated

Regular gym-goers commonly face the problem of carrying two separate bottles—one for water and the other for their protein shakes or mixes.

Umoro's One Shaker bottle comes as a solution with separate containers. The major portion holds water, while the other compartment, attached to the lid, holds up to 50ml of the mixture separately. At the press of a button, the mixture is released into the water to make the shake. This bottle costs around ₹ 1300 ($20).

Another interesting product is Mark One's Prime Vessyl. This is a sensorised water bottle that can track the amount of water consumed and provide insight about your body's hydration level through a smartphone application. It costs about ₹ 4500 ($70).

The Prime Vessyl

The Umoro One shaker

The Athos shirt

Is your body-fat in check?

Skulpt is an innovative gadget to check your body's muscle and fat content. It is a flat device, which can measure the fat of 24 different body parts. Just place it on your body part and it releases a weak current that does all the measurement. Based on your fat and muscle definition, the proprietary mobile application configured on the device can also set specific training advices for you. It is available for about ₹ 6500 ($99) from the vendor's website.

The Skulpt system

Smartwear for better fitness

There are a lot of options in wearables that almost completely eliminate the need for separate fitness gears. Shoes, socks or even full bodywears are coming in smart form factor to provide clear insight into your fitness metrics.

Athos, a fitness apparel startup, has brought forward a range of shirts, shorts and trousers that can give a complete view of your workout