

Tips For Getting Investors For Your Start-up

Are you working hard but still not getting investors for your start-up? Here's how you can systematically raise your start-up's value to the stars!

EFY Bureau

Building an electronics start-up is undoubtedly a lot of hard work but is also euphoric in a sense. When you build up your start-up, you slowly see your vision and dream taking shape. It is like your first child, and the very first moment you hold it in your hands it feels like the most joyous one ever.

So, it is clearly going to hurt when someone undervalues it. The hard work and struggles may feel unacknowledged. You may feel baffled and helpless trying to figure out where exactly did you go wrong. Read ahead to know how you can build assets that will sky-rocket your start-up's value!

The first step towards finding out the formula to raising the value of your organisation is to ascertain if it is a start-up or a company. With so many start-ups coming up recently, a lot of people have been using the two terms interchangeably. But there is a clear distinction.

"Most people tend to call a company a start-up because of the glamour attached to the term. But it's wrong. To put it simply, a start-up is a small company that has not yet found a working and scalable business model," says Anand Tamboli, founder and CEO of Anand Tamboli and Co.

He adds, "If you have been working for more than two years and haven't found a scalable and working business model, and