

TEAM COMES FIRST... Maybe Not

The order of priorities may vary, but building a strong team is essential for the long-term success of any startup. By strategically navigating the product, funding, and team building journey, entrepreneurs can lay a solid foundation for growth. The author takes on this topic next in his ongoing series on business asset management

ANAND TAMBOLI
is a serial entrepreneur,
speaker, award-winning author,
and an emerging-technology thought leader

I can do it all myself.” This is what some entrepreneurs believe when they begin. Now, while it is true that founders often wear multiple hats in the early stages, building a strong team is crucial for long-term success and growth.

But here’s the catch: When should you really build the team? What comes first? Product, funding, customers, or team?

If you have been following the asset series for a few months now, you already know that quite a few things come before you can think about hiring your very first team member.

So, the first key point here is—for a startup, the team doesn’t come first but much later.

When the time is right...

However, once you are done with those steps, you will reach a point where getting