Visibility generates attention.

What makes you more visible?

When people look at advertisements and PR, it is easy to misunderstand that visibility can only be bought with tons of money. While these things may amplify your visibility, without three key ingredients it will be unlikely.

Moreover, visibility is not always about PR or advertisements. Its scope and reach are much wider. Your product or service, the content around your business, and the way it is made available do play a crucial role in your visibility. While having just one thing is useless, having two does not take you much further.

When you ignore the format

Many times, businesses have a useful product as well as some content, but not necessarily in a desirable format. This is useful, but not as much.

It results in sluggish growth, and the businesses cannot scale. Mostly this happens as a result of the DIY approach. It is understandably a poor man's formula to plug the gaps. However, it does not do any justice from a scale or speed perspective.

Format = Sluggish Growth

When you ignore content

Some businesses do the other way round. They invest in an appropriate format and ensure they have a useful product. But lack of content soon makes it quite boring and mundane. Typically, all advertisements fall into this category.

Eventually, these ads become invisible and so does the business. People keep posting on social media about the greatness of their products, but that's where it stops. There is nothing more to it.

When you have weak or no product

This one is a rare occurrence, but not impossible. It is when the business shifts its focus to producing content and ensuring appropriate format. However, what is the point of all this if there is no value added, if there is no valuable product to sell?

It is a sheer waste of money, which creates a lot of buzz and noise but does nothing for your business or customer. Content and format are there to amplify your product or service. If product is no good, amplification won't help.

Vanity

Why are they important?

While these three factors look seemingly obvious, businesses have shown some resistance to accepting them as critical factors. It makes things difficult because if people don't appreciate the importance, they are unlikely to take any action.

BUILDING A PRODUCT ECOSYSTEM TAKES TIME, BUT IT'S WORTH THE EFFORT

And by the way, the same applies to your customers too. If they do not appreciate the importance of your business and the value it delivers, they will do the same—they will not take any action.

Let's take a quick look at why each factor makes sense and why it is important.

Product

The term product does not only mean a set of physical items. Many services can also be delivered as products with a standardised delivery mechanism. This way even services can be replicated by several people. Essentially, a product is what your customer wants to achieve their desired outcomes with.

However, after working with hundreds of businesses, we have observed that having one product in your portfolio or offering is severely limiting. Unfortunately, everything relies on one product and then it becomes a bottleneck.

If you were to increase your chances of success, you need multiple products. Not just several disjointed products or product variants, but a portfolio that makes sense together. An ecosystem of products and services is often a prudent way to progress.

While your core offer or product must solve significant pain for the customer, the rest of the portfolio should support that offering in some way. Building such a product ecosystem takes time, but it is absolutely worth the effort.

Content

You may have often heard people saying content is king. It can be in the form of reports, brochures, podcasts, blogs, videos, photos, designs, books, or anything else you can imagine. This content essentially
