

CONTENT Is NOT THE KING Anymore

In a world awash with content, it is the authentic connections we forge that truly matter. Next in his series on business asset management, the author takes on the shift from selling to connecting; what makes our content resonate and truly count?

The 20th century was a time marked by scarcity. People grappled with a lack of resources, money, technology, and much more. This century, on the contrary, is more about too much of everything. We have transitioned from dealing with scarcity to managing abundance.

We now have an abundance of content, data, information, knowledge, people, products, suppliers, platforms, and almost anything you can think of.

But abundance is not necessarily a good thing. It is not bad either. It just changes the equation differently. It has consequences.

While the abundance of products leads to commoditisation driving down the prices, the abundance of information leads to overload, misinformation, and confusion. It also leads to an expectation of 'free' stuff. That way, content is already free everywhere. It makes me believe that content isn't the king anymore; it is now available for free!

But every abundance also creates a new kind of scarcity. Abundant content creates noise and confusion. It lacks differentiation. Therefore, mindful curation, commentary, branding, packaging, and filtering become important. The abun-
