dance of expertise results in a scarcity of trust and heightened confusion, underscoring the need for credibility.

The content is not about you

In one of my previous articles, I emphasised the importance of content in the whole scheme of things. But doing it in a normal way was not the idea. Essentially, the content is not about you.

Content is not about ads. Many businesses mistake content for advertisements or marketing copies. Sometimes they are plain and simple, at other times, they are disguised as opinion pieces or authored articles.

Eventually, these ads or ad-like content become invisible and so does the business. People keep posting on social media about the greatness of their products, but that is where it stops. There is nothing more to it.

Content is not only about collateral. Reports, brochures, podcasts, blogs, videos, photos, designs, books, or anything else essentially help people to get to know your business. It also clarifies your thinking.

Content is not only about sales pitch. Most businesses see content as a means to focus on selling products or services. Sometimes that is blatant, at other times it is a softer sell. But regardless, the value it offers or insights it provides are miniscule.

If a piece of content is easy to read, has the right amount of entertaining quality, and upon reading it helps one solve a particular problem then it is useful. That makes it more relevant. It may not and does not have to necessarily sell something to someone. Being helpful without any expectations may seem too much but that is the key point I am making here.

What is it about then?

If the content is not about ads, marketing collateral, and sales pitches, then what is it about really?

I wish the answer was plain and simple. So, when dealing with such complex answers, we can go back to the principles and see what needs to happen.

Imagine that your customers are in situation A and they want to be in situation B. Essentially, there is always a difference between current reality and future aspirations. Whatever you do as an entrepreneur must help them bridge that gap. It is true for your product, services, or even for the content.

A scenario

Now, let me describe a typical customer's journey to highlight some keywords that will serve as anchors for all the principles we will cover.

Your customers want to go from A to B because they have some 'desires.' They are trying to attain a specific 'goal' by achieving certain 'outcomes.' And they are trying to do that because once they achieve that out-
