

come, there will be a ‘payoff.’ There will be a ‘prize’ that your customer is yearning for.

But something is ‘blocking’ them from achieving their goal. There are some ‘inhibitors’ or major roadblocks your customers are facing or feeling. And this is causing them ‘pain.’ When they try to solve their problems, they face ‘hassles.’

You may be able to identify some of the ‘common experiences’ your customers have when their problem persists. Sometimes their problems are not actual problems. Instead, they are ‘symptoms’ of some real underlying problems.

At other times, the customers may not have an apparent problem. Instead, they have ‘objections’ because they don’t want to take a step further to achieve their goal. Maybe they have a ‘fear’ that is stopping them from taking a step. But you know the ‘upside,’ the benefit your customer will get by shedding that fear.

Now, you are an expert on that ‘topic,’ and you know a specific ‘tool’ to solve their problem. It is based on some ‘principle’ that you know of or your ‘new idea.’ Then, with those principles, tools, and ideas, you can help them get the ‘results’ they want. And you can do that because you have a track record, you have some ‘experience’ in that ‘industry’ or field.

With this scenario in mind, there are seven principle pillars to consider:

1. Provide key insights. These are important insights and foundational principles about your solution, product, or service. It is an area of your expertise. So based on your experience, you can write about key insights you have gathered over several years.

When you know what your customer is trying to achieve, giving them a high-level direction is highly useful. Unravel the topic a bit further, much like peeling the onion.

Sometimes a comparison between two or more things can also help provide a well-balanced perspective. And by doing that, you will establish your credibility and highlight the gamut of experience you have.

2. Diagnose headaches and pain points. It is about the combination of problems and symptoms. You should talk about the diagnosis of customers’ headaches or pain points.

Sometimes, simply uncovering these issues and clarifying them or articulating them well can be quite helpful.

3. Address common objections.

Expose the resistance to change. Sometimes simply vocalising or exposing the resistance to change is relieving. People often feel that their objections are unique, and everyone else has got their stuff together. But when you vocalise them and expose them, customers can feel relieved.

Now they know that they are not the only ones with those objections. That helps them open up further and seek help, most likely from you.

4. Develop a useful resource map. A classic one could be providing a ‘How to’ guide. This type of content is abundant on the internet, and it talks about useful resources to do something.

Think about this for a second, if two people have put out content on ‘how-to’ about something. Which one are you likely to follow? I bet you would prefer a more credible one, won’t you? So, how do you know who is more credible?

I think, if someone knows and understands my problem well, their advice is likely to be more helpful. That’s where the previous two principles help to establish that credibility.

5. Showcase the whole and its parts. Talk about your ‘Principal method.’ It is the method you use to solve someone’s problems and provide solutions. It is the principle on which your product or service is based. It is the science of why your solution works. It is how your ideas are implemented or can be implemented.

You don’t have to elaborate on everything, but showing some bits and pieces is quite helpful. Provide enough high-level ideas to give your customers confidence that you can help them achieve their goals.

6. Talk about common blunders.

At times highlighting common blunders and mistakes your customers might be making can be a lighter approach. Explain mistakes and errors that slow their progress.

When people see that you know what does not work, they tend to assume that you might know what works too. And that thinking gives your customers some more confidence to approach you.

7. Highlight results and outcomes.

Highlighting the ‘desired payoff’ is another way to provide insights about future scenarios. Payoffs are essentially attractive results and outcomes that your customers are aspiring for.

When you highlight what people can gain by working on something or your ideas, it is more likely that they will take action to engage with you. Something like a cost-benefit analysis type of information that highlights the benefits of following your ideas.

The point is Content is the window to your intellect. In one way, it shows who you are as an entrepreneur and why. In another way, it helps you build trust and highlight your uniqueness. Because eventually, when expertise becomes abundant, credibility becomes precious.

Content is not the king anymore. It is already free. But if you were to look beyond content, only as a means to achieve something else, then you can see it differently. It is the medium through which you can reach your target audience and build a reputation that precedes you. The good news is that there are many ways of doing it.

How are you doing it? EFY