

“Marketing That Delivers Intentional Messages To Resonate With Customers Creates The Secret Sauce For Mouser”

KEVIN HESS
SENIOR VICE PRESIDENT - MARKETING, MOUSER ELECTRONICS

After graduating from Penn State University with a degree in business logistics, Kevin Hess never imagined reaching the top echelons of technical marketing at Mouser Electronics, a Top 10 Global Distributor of Electronic Components. But as he puts it, “I’ve learned to love it.” In a recent interview with EFY, Hess, who is senior vice president of marketing at the global authorised semiconductor distributor, opens up about Mouser, marketing and more. Here are some excerpts from the interview:

In your opinion, how has marketing changed over the years, especially with the advent of online advertising?

Over the last 10 years, marketing has really turned digital and into smart marketing, where we are able to provide relevant content to our customers. Moreover, you can better measure marketing now—whether it converted to a sale, and how many clicks you’re getting. If it’s an online ad, you can see how many impressions and how much traffic is driven. Another aspect is the growth of localised marketing, for which we now have many local teams throughout India, Asia, and Europe.

Please elaborate on the local marketing aspect.

Sitting in Texas, I might not be the best person to communicate with a customer in India. I’m not familiar with their culture and interests. So, we have teams in Bangalore who specialise in marketing and service that meet the needs of customers in India. Likewise, we have teams throughout Asia and Europe that perform the same roles for customers in those areas. We believe you can’t do marketing the same way in every country; you must connect with people to know what they need.

How has marketing at Mouser evolved during this period?